Writers with solid foundations as confident emergent writers are able to engage in mark-making activities in a variety of ways, often found through role play, experimentation, and the use of mark-making tools. These activities help to build children's confidence in their ability to make marks and eventually write, as they understand the relationship between sounds, the letters that represent them, and the words they form. The process of writing is closely linked to language development, and understanding these relationships is crucial for children's development in early years settings.

In the early years, role play can be a powerful tool for helping children to develop their writing skills. By incorporating mark-making activities into role play, children can explore the concepts of writing in a practical and engaging way. They can experiment with different materials, such as pencils, pens, paper, and even tools like builders' sets, to make marks and create their own stories. This hands-on approach allows children to build their confidence in writing, as they see the marks they make transform into words and sentences.

The process of writing is closely linked to the development of mathematical ideas, such as number and measurement. Children can use tools like rulers and rulers to measure and draw their own marks, and this can help them to understand the importance of accuracy in writing. The use of writing belts, for example, can be a motivating tool for children who are just beginning to write, as it provides them with a way to support their writing and gives them a sense of control.

The use of mark-making activities in role play can be particularly effective for children who are resistant to writing. By providing them with the opportunity to experiment and explore, children can discover the joys of writing, and become more confident and engaged writers. As children develop their writing skills, they can begin to use their writing belts to write their own stories, and to take pride in their achievements. This can be a powerful way to encourage children to become confident writers, and to enjoy the process of writing as much as possible.
